Ask Todd Brown, Vice President of Client Services for the law firm Baker, Sanders, Barshay, Grossman, Fass, Muhlstock and Neuwirth, about his employee Jeremy, and you'll learn about a committed staff member who always does his best for his employer.

“Nobody wants to do better than Jeremy. He’s constantly asking for additional responsibilities. In a law firm, there are always definitive job lines, but he is constantly taking on more tasks and he does them well.”

Jeremy has worked at Baker, Sanders, et al. for over four years. He is responsible for document preparation for trials and litigation, including scanning, photocopying and sorting. It's important work that needs to be done correctly and with precision. The patience both the firm and his supervisor have shown in training Jeremy continues to pay dividends.

“Jeremy may require more time to learn a new job task than some of our other staff members. But once Jeremy learns the task and gets it right he’ll always get it right.”

Todd Brown is unequivocal in his support of employees like Jeremy.

“You really are going to get an employee who is very capable and skilled. The commitment level is so far superior to that of the average employee. There’s no shortfall of sick time, leaving early, excessive socializing in the office. You get an honest day’s work for an honest day’s pay.”
